Book Reviews

3 ATENEO L.J. 146 (1953)

The following book reviews appear in this issue:

(1) Leonard P. Moore, Motion Practice and Strategy (1946).

The Book presents essential principles in the field of preliminary motion practice and strategy. It points out several factors that are important in determining the motions the lawyer should make such as the particulars of each case, the timing, the preferences of the judge, the substantive law involved, among others. It highlights the fact that success in this area increases the possibility of a favorable result in the case.

(2) Irving Stone, Clarence Darrow, For the Defense (1941).

The Book is a biography of Clarence Darrow, a lawyer known for his integrity and willingness to take up unpopular causes, even at a personal cost. It presents Darrow's stand on certain controversial issues not only in the hopes of clarifying them but also of serving as an example to the young generations of lawyers who will read about his life.

(3) Philip C. Jessup, A Modern Law of Nations (1948).

The Book discusses the need for a modern system of international law. The Author attempts to analyze historical experience using novel concepts in international law. It explores the possible bases of this new order, debunks traditional principles of the archaic law of nations, and forwards the principle of community interest as an essential consideration of international relations.
