

The Need for a Strong Judiciary

Judge Conrado V. Sanchez

1 ATENEO L.J. 25 (1951)

SUBJECT(S): POLITICAL LAW

KEYWORD(S): JUDICIARY

The Article addresses the prevailing problem in society regarding the diminishing morality and standard of justice among men. The effects of moral bankruptcy and spiritual blackout remain unchecked, requiring that men confront these issues sternly. This brings about the need for a strong Judiciary, focused primarily on the judges who should command respect, and are regarded as men of the highest type of proven ability, who are finite, human, and men with untarnished names. While the system should provide as the last bulwark in the protection of rights, Judges are the main players that should retain this protection. We need a strong Judiciary, taking into account the fallibility of humans, who are subject to imperfection and frailties of other men. As Aristotle points, “justice is the first concern of mankind.”
