

Global Women: Exploring New Perspectives of Human Rights Issues in Female Migration

José Victor Chan Gonzaga
48 ATENEO L.J. 1016 (2004)

SUBJECT(S): HUMAN RIGHTS, FEMALE MIGRATION, ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

KEYWORD(S): HUMAN RIGHTS, FEMALE MIGRATION, ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT, GLOBALIZATION, RIGHT TO DEVELOPMENT, GENDER EQUALITY, CHILDREN'S RIGHTS, HUMAN RIGHTS-BASED APPROACH TO DEVELOPMENT

The Article begins with a narrative about the life of a mother who has worked abroad and served as a migrant worker. In light of the said narrative, the Author then points out the necessity of reexamining and re-understanding migrant workers' rights and highlights perspectives on human rights issues which arise from female migration, particularly women engaged in domestic work, as a tool for economic development.

An introduction into the topic is presented in the form of figures, facts, and conflicts related to globalization and female migration. Next, female migration is presented as related to the right to development, particularly of developing countries and of women as individuals. In this Part of the Article, the role of the State in economic development from the point of view of female migrant workers is also noted. Third, female migration is also discussed in light of gender equality and children's rights. In conclusion, the Author notes that globalization and female migration does unearth questions about the impact of current development strategies and recommends the possibility of integrating a human rights-based approach in economic development.